RE: Bus Discoloration

In reference to the noted Siemens Bus Discoloration matter we offer the following:

Siemens has exceeded the specification for this project by supplying silver plated bus bars. The project specification calls for only the joints to be silver plated which is standard UL-891-2005 Clause 8.8.1.1.5. It is common practice for most manufacturers like Siemens to provide complete silver plated bus bars for commercial considerations. The purpose of the silver plating is to reduce oxidation in the joint. It is inside the joint, around the bolt, where the current transfer takes place. In the case of the bus in question, the silver plating has oxidized in areas outside the joints where it is exposed to oxygen. The joint itself is not exposed to oxygen and therefore the silver plating in the joint will not oxidize and remain intact.

We cannot determine the cause of the discoloration of the bus after it has left our factory. The bus discoloration in question has only occurred to the exposed, non-critical portion of the bus, and will not impede or affect the performance of the bus. The silver plating inside the joints will remain intact. It is a common occurrence for a certain level of discoloration to form on equipment outside factory conditions. This noted discoloration or oxidation will not affect the performance of this equipment and can go untreated as a result.

Siemens will stand by its factory warranty per the terms and conditions of this contract.

Sincerely,

Harry W. Josten
